PAWNS!

By Dean; the Minstrel Wyrn

As much as I love 3D plastic miniatures, the Pathfinder Pawns is rapidly becoming a favorite as well, offering us additional choices to "represent" enemies and allies in Pathfinder's specific Adventure Paths (like Iron Gods). Don't get me wrong I'd LOVE an actual set of pre-painted plastic miniatures for Iron Gods (not everyone would I realize) ... but since that probably won't happen, the Pawns will certainly do nicely.

Useful for special purposes

By C.K.

Pathfinder Pawns are a direct replacement for miniatures, as they're exponentially cheaper, much easier to store, and available in a much larger variety. You can also get Pathfinder Pawns of specific NPCs that match the artwork in the books, and there are sets like "Inner Sea Codex" that give you tons of options for custom characters.

This set is unique in that it provides technological adversaries -- androids, various types of robots, and NPCs wielding steampunk and alien tech weapons. In addition to working with the Iron Gods adventure path, a large percentage of these pawns will also be useful for games like Shadowrun.

The only drawback is that I'd have liked to have had some more duplicates of the rarer monsters. The set gives you what you need for the encounters in the adventure path if you run it EXACTLY as written, but if characters level faster than expected you won't be able to adjust the numbers of opponents upwards.

This also makes it harder to use these pawns for "use any minis you like" wargames like Songs of Blades and Heroes and Mutants and Death Ray Guns, 'natch, since you won't have enough of certain pawns to really use them properly. But I don't think Paizo really had that use in mind.

Satisfied. Bear in mind though, that it does ...

By Mike

Satisfied. Bear in mind though, that it does NOT come with any stands - it is mentioned on the packaging, but still this fact may go overlooked. The pawns look great
